BIOGRAPHY

Born in San José, Costa Rica in 1968, Priscilla Monge is one of the foremost conceptual artists of Central America. Graduating from the University of Costa Rica in 1995 with a degree in painting, she has since embraced a wide variety of mediums, including textiles, video, installation, and photography. Her work explores the violence and brutality that exist in the everyday, often tackling these themes with humor and cynicism.

With her first exhibition, Priscilla no Pintura (Priscilla doesn't paint), she showed her desire to embrace forms of artistic expression beyond what her traditional arts education had taught. When asked why she turned from her conservative training to focus more on conceptual modalities, she said she needed to be able "to talk about certain things". This response is often seen quite literally in her work, with text playing a prominent role; a letter delicately embroidered on linen or meditative phrases carved into marble books. For Monge, the written word is a safe space in which she can uncover and discuss what is often unable to be said out loud. "I think most of my doing is about uncovering things, about telling what cannot be told. About the unspeakable."

To explore the "unspeakable" she often turns to materials in the domestic and scholastic sphere. She employs items such as fabric, chalkboards, soap, and fine china to weave delicate yet arresting narratives of cruelty and innocence, blurring the lines between love and aggression, pleasure and oppression. For her, these everyday materials hold "the possibility of being familiar and unfamiliar at the same time", allowing her to explore the small everyday atrocities that can permeate our lives. In one such work, Bloody Day, she has sewn a pair of trousers out of sanitary napkins and walked around the streets of San Jose, soaked in her own period blood. Such a work highlights her focus on politicizing the personal and showing the violence that often remains hidden; in this case using the sanitary napkin to bring into the open the internal violence that women must bear within their body's borders, whilst simultaneously demonstrating the fear and shame of the larger patriarchal society in which they must bear it.

Today, Monge lives and works in San José. She has exhibited widely, participating in the Venice and Liverpool Biennials, with works shown in institutions such as the Museo Rufino Tamayo, the Tate Modern, Centro de Arte Contemporaneo in Sevilla and the Museo de Arte y Diseño Contemporaneo in Costa Rica among others.

THE ARCHIVED BODY

PRISCILLA MONGE

There cannot be an archive without some form of death, without a physical presence of that which no longer exists.

Through the years, when working with a personal trauma, I tried to ensure that the work was not only interesting to me, but that it was also important for others in some way. Now, my interests in art have shifted and I am no longer working with my own experiences. Now, I am very much concerned with the pain of others.

Three years ago, I started investigating Costa Rica's involvement during the long period of wars and violence in Central America. We claimed to be neutral, but that was far from the truth. In my investigation, I stumbled upon testimonies of survivors of that terrible violence in Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua. Those survivor's testimonies at Truth Commissions were devastating.

What to do with all this pain? Do I have the right to talk about the painful experiences of others? Is it art? All those questions still permeate everything I do.

The stories are so tragic that people might tend to go over them. It is quite common that, when the truth is so unbearable, people evade it. But art uses metaphors and creates bridges that help people to get closer to certain realities.

The representation of death has been a constant concern in my work. In recent years I experienced the loss of very dear friends, which brought me close to a position of understanding, in some way, the inevitability of death; of our own and that of others. My concern has expanded to death as a text or a narrative, where we sometimes find characters that have nothing else to "say" and then die. Even though death cannot be fully understood, nor represented, or those who die do not come back to explain it, I have been trying to find ways to talk about it, to work with it.

Death is inscribed like an epitaph on every body, but this inscription appears to be stronger in vulnerable bodies: feminine bodies, queer bodies, black bodies, and the bodies of the poor. Bodies like these are often denied the vital importance of having an archive, of being archived.

Would it be possible that we as artists can be archivists as well? Can art create more sensible, more sensual, more vulnerable and more accessible archives? Can we conceive of archives that are not just storage, but that can be awakened from a long dream when someone 'touches' them?

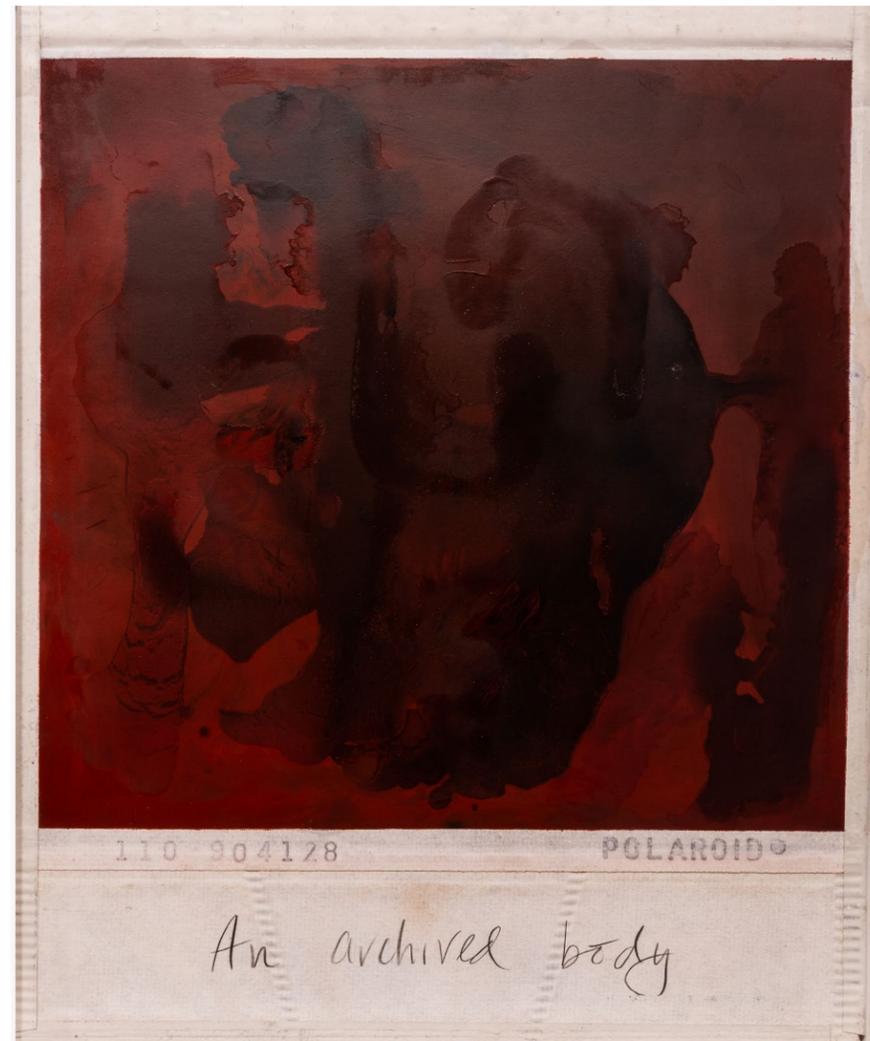

Everything I chose to present here are works that bring us closer to these questions. Some of them are recent and others were made at the beginning of the nineties.
